

SIMON J CLEARY OVERALL BIO

Simon J. Cleary is an Irish-born entrepreneur, strategist, and creative operator whose life has been shaped as much by hard experience as by ambition. Originally from Ireland and later spending over sixteen years in Vancouver before relocating to Mexico, Simon carries a distinctly global perspective — equal parts streetwise realism, humor, and relentless adaptability. He is deeply entrepreneurial by nature, constantly building, testing, and refining ideas across AI, media, automation, branding, storytelling, and online business ecosystems.

At his core, Simon is both a systems thinker and a storyteller. He gravitates toward projects that combine creativity with leverage: AI-powered due diligence systems, automated CRM and sales infrastructure, viral media tools, narrative-driven branding, and scalable digital products. He has a particular fascination with how technology, psychology, and narrative intersect — not just in business, but in culture itself. Whether conceptualizing platforms like Operation Hydra or HydraClip, building multilingual landing pages, or dissecting the emotional mechanics of entertainment brands and fan psychology, Simon approaches projects with a rare mix of strategic depth and instinctive creativity.

He has little patience for superficiality, corporate theater, or blind optimism. Years of navigating business, people, and life have made him deeply skeptical of easy answers and highly attuned to manipulation, inefficiency, and self-delusion. He values competence, loyalty, honesty, resilience, and people who can think independently under pressure. He respects authenticity over polish and substance over appearances. His worldview leans pragmatic and occasionally cynical, though beneath that sits a strong moral code centered on fairness, reciprocity, and protecting the people he loves.

Nothing matters more to Simon than his daughters and family. Much of his drive, risk-taking, and long-term thinking stems from a desire to build security, freedom, and opportunity for them. That protective instinct extends into his personal relationships as well — especially toward people who have endured trauma, manipulation, or injustice. He has shown consistent emotional intelligence when navigating difficult family dynamics and has a strong sensitivity toward coercion, gaslighting, and abusive systems.

Creatively, Simon is drawn toward layered, emotionally intelligent storytelling rather than shallow spectacle. He appreciates narratives that expose uncomfortable truths, moral ambiguity, institutional failure, and the psychological cost of survival. His taste tends toward work with emotional architecture beneath the surface — stories, brands, music, or characters that evolve rather than simply perform. He is highly analytical about why audiences connect to certain ideas, often breaking down emotional resonance, archetypes, identity, and cultural timing with unusual precision.

His communication style is direct, witty, and often cheeky, but he values clarity over ego. He actively seeks critique rather than validation and prefers uncomfortable truth to comforting nonsense. In both creative and business contexts, he consistently pushes for strategic realism: identifying weak assumptions, structural flaws, hidden opportunity costs, and the difference between ideas that sound exciting and ideas that can actually survive contact with reality.

Simon's dislikes are equally defining. He has little tolerance for manipulative personalities, fake authority, bureaucratic stagnation, shallow branding without substance, or people who weaponize victimhood while refusing accountability. He is wary of systems that reward appearances over competence and tends to distrust institutions that become self-protective rather than mission-driven. He also has a strong aversion to wasted potential — both in himself and in others.

Despite the skepticism, there is a fundamentally constructive thread running through everything he does. Simon is not interested in cynicism for its own sake; he is interested in building things that work, stories that matter, systems that scale, and relationships grounded in truth rather than performance. Underneath the entrepreneurial intensity and strategic mindset is someone who still believes that loyalty, humor, courage, and genuine human connection are the only things ultimately worth building around.

